WORKING MARRIED WOMEN

Mrs. F. D. R. Speaks Her Mind About Controversy

MRS. F. D. ROOSEVELT opposes family bureaucracies

The controversy about married women working has bobbed into the news again with the suggestion by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt that the best way to combat the legislative trend to bar married women from state and local government is to bring out the "facts."

"Efforts are now being made to find out what the facts are," the President's wife says in the August issue of The Democratic Digest, publication of the Women's Division, Democratic National Committee, "and once they are verified I think women will have a basis for realistic presentation of the situation of married women as regards employment in general."

The First Lady declares that so far as she knows the number of married women in industry now is "comparatively small," has "very little effect on unemployment" and in most cases the women are engaged in work "unsuitable" for men. On the other hand, Mrs. Roosevelt thinks that "a good case" can be made against employing more than one member of a family in local, state or federal government when the salary of one of them provides an adequate standard of living.

Depends on Standard "It is important not to create a family bureaucracy in government," she holds. "When you find all of the members of a family working in the government service and bringing home to the same house an income clearly in excess of the normal family income, then I think it is time to consider passing a law not discriminating against married women, or men, or young people, or any specific group, but simply stating that to safeguard government service it is necessary to employ only one member of a family where the salary received is above a given amount."

However, Mrs. Roosevelt does not think two members of a family, living in the same house, should be barred from government employment "if the lack of one salary would prevent a marriage or make obligatory a very low standard of living."

Mrs. Roosevelt's opinions were given in response to a question asked her by Mrs. W. B. Murphy of Snow Hill, North Carolina: "Nineteen state legislatures have introduced bills during the past year to bar women who are married from employment in state and local government and in certain types of work. What steps can you suggest that women take to offset this trend?"
